

WATERCOLOR

A particularity of the watercolor painting is that white is not used and the color of the paper is used for the areas that must remain white.

With this technique, we proceed first by identifying the parts in light and then adding the color in the dark parts.

The use of watercolors requires a certain speed of execution and does not allow second thoughts, this makes it a not very easy technique to master.

Students start by wetting the whole work surface, dipping the sheet of paper in the water and letting it dry enough to start painting.

Then they proceed by transferring the drawing on the paper with very light strokes and then applying the color in glazes, starting from the lightest base and then adding the chiaroscuro.

An alternative method is to wet only certain areas of the paper and let the color expand autonomously within these areas, but this will require a certain skill on the part of the artist to know how to guide and follow the movement of the color on the paper to get the desired results.
